It will be seen that in all these cases the woman is a potential wife for the man she calls wagun, for he may have as his wives two sisters either synchronously or consecutively, and he is entitled to take his brother's wife after the death of his brother. If this marriage takes place, the terms for 'husband' and 'wife' are substituted for wagun. But as long as the wagun relationship obtains, certain restrictions are observed. I once saw Marotē pass near a log on which her wagun, Togen, was sitting. As she approached she called out 'Watagio!' ('Look out!') Immediately he rose from his seat, and remained standing till she had gone. People who are wagun to each other may not eat in each other's presence. If this cannot be avoided, the woman must cover her face with her hood. They may not touch each other's body or hair. A man's wife's sister may not prepare his food. Sobak's wife's sister, Bawt, was divorced from her husband at Hanahan and came to live with her sister at Kurtatchi. In the olden days Sobak would, he told me, have married her, but he refrained from doing so in deference to the wishes of the priest, who discourages polygamy. Bawt and her three children, however, made their home permanently with Sobak and his wife, sharing their single hut. While his wife was paying a visit to her relations at Hanahan, both continued to sleep in the hut, but Sobak went to his kiar, Watchiu, to get his meals. (Thus precisely reversing the taboos observed among ourselves!)

Wagun may not address each other by their personal names, but may use adopted names, e.g. the woman may be called by the name she takes if her child dies. For example, Pesē's first child died when it could barely walk; since then she has been known as Tchinamoa—'mother of one (dead child)'. Matarē, her sister's husband, calls her by this name, never using the name Pesē.

These taboos are usually brought to an end when the mother or father of the woman dies. Ceremonial pudding is prepared by the woman and her sister. A length of imun (ceremonial currency of flying fox or porpoise teeth) is hung on a spear by her sister's husband, and put up beside her hut. The woman comes out with her hood on her head. Her wagun comes up to her and takes it off. The woman then takes possession of the spear and the imun, but at some later date she must reciprocate with another gift of like nature. The two families eat the ceremonial pudding together, and the wagun taboos then cease to be observed.

the bush. Here it is not always convenient to lie down, so a standing position is adopted, the man behind the woman who bends her body forward. I have two drawings, both done by young men, showing couples in this position, and on one occasion when I observed children playing at copulation it was done thus.

The bush is the favourite place for love-making. The taro garden is frequently chosen by husband and wife; clandestine lovers prefer the uncleared bush. This preference is the basis of some of the stock insults current among these people. A person of either sex who is angry with a woman will say to her: 'Wanits i ratsu.' 'You copulate in the bush', or 'Giug i ratsu.' 'You conceive in the bush.' (These are indicatives, not imperatives.)[1]

As far as I know, there are no periods of special licence, nor is there any occasion on which extra-marital intercourse is either enjoined or sanctioned with ritual significance, unless we include the punishment of a woman in this manner for breaking taboos connected with the boys' puberty rites (see Chap. VI).

Sexual abstinence is imposed upon certain individuals under special circumstances, but I do not know of any time when the prohibition is general. A woman must refrain from intercourse for some time after the birth of a child. The young men who act as sponsors (amro) to the adolescent boys wearing the upi must remain continent during certain stages of the puberty rites. Abstinence during the previous night is essential if a man wishes to succeed in bonito fishing, but there are 'medicines' whereby the result of breaking this taboo may be circumvented.

PROSTITUTION

I learned of nothing that could be described as prostitution occurring among these people, as is perhaps to be expected in a community where a partner can be obtained without difficulty. Presents of tobacco, betel, &c., will sometimes pass between lovers, but these are signs of preference, not payment for services rendered. In most villages there are some women who are known to be liberal with their favours, usually these are young wives whose husbands are away working as indentured labourers.

[1] Other stock insults are concerned with incestuous relationships and with faeces, just as in other parts of Melanesia. Typical examples are 'No en sse a tin a tfinmen!' 'Go eat your mother's faeces!' 'Tetop tfinen!' 'Copulate with your mother!'

Bunabuoie, Bunasom, Bunasobak, all famous rain-makers in their day. Beside the box containing these stones stood a kerosene tin full of the mixture of salt water, fresh water, and sap with which he filled the coco-nut shells, and another tin containing rain-water.

When he wants to make rain, he washes each of these stones with rain-water, in which he has put the leaves of two plants, tataboan and malias (unidentified). He stirred up the tin to show me the leaves at the bottom, and poured a little of the water out and back again. As he did so there was a peal of thunder, which he attributed to his having touched the water. It was, oddly enough, the only peal that day. Having washed the stones, he rubs them with the mixture of wet leaves. Then he fills up the five coco-nuts, and puts them in a tree, resting them in one of the topa (elk-horn ferns, which abound on the trunks of trees in this region; their leaves are spread out into a kind of cup in which the coco-nuts could be lodged safely). If you want wind as well as rain, you choose a topa which is near the top of the tree, if you want rain only, you choose one which grows low down. After five days, come and take out the leaf stoppers of the coco-nuts. To stop the rain, take down the coco-nuts, pour out all the water, put back the leaf stoppers, and cover up the stones and other apparatus.

Riamē said he could not give me one of the stones, because they belonged to the past, but he offered me one of the five coco-nut shells with the mixture it contained. The gift was entirely spontaneous on his part; he said I could make rain with it in my own country.

The place where the stones are kept is not hidden, but the other people are afraid to go near it. Before I knew what the queer-looking group of objects signified, I once, when walking near the spot with some little boys, went towards it to see what it was. The boys, very scared, called to me to come away, or I would get boils on my skin! So I did not pursue my investigations further at that time. When I was taken there by the appropriate person, he was most careful that no one should see us set out, and looked back several times to make sure we were not followed.

This form of procedure has not yet been taught to Kakari, but there is another method, not involving the secret of the stones, of which he is in possession. Riamē learned it from the Amun people, living some little distance away. Kakari has not yet become a very successful rain-maker. He told me one day that he thought some or even made especially, to be used as a medium of exchange is only doubtfully represented, since tobacco is smoked, and the strings of shell disks function also as ornaments. The strings of teeth may perhaps approximate to it, since they are made to serve as valuables and are worn only very exceptionally for ceremonial purposes. But they are not quite typical of the 'money' stage, because they have a ceremonial significance, and are reserved for use on certain specified occasions, and because some are regarded as heirlooms and would on no account be parted with by their owners. The recent introduction of English and Australian shillings by white planters and traders brings the area to the fourth stage, the use of coin, i.e. a medium of exchange authorized by the Government with a fixed value. This will probably spread till it has superseded the others, except perhaps the use of stick tobacco.

RECOMPENSE FOR SERVICES RENDERED

A man's friends will help him with a task which is more than he can compass alone, e.g. the building of a house or a canoe. Such services are voluntarily given, and are never withheld when asked for. But it is expected that the recipient will, in his turn, help those who have given their services when they are in similar need. As a rule, he will make a small feast to mark the completion of the work, at which all who have assisted him are presented with ceremonial pudding and taro (but not pig unless the occasion is a very special one). One such feast, for the completion of a mon, is described on p. 379. The canoe remains the personal property of the man who initiated its building. When it is taken out for bonito fishing, it is recognized that he has the first claim on the catch, and if only one fish is hooked it belongs to him. If there are several, he shares them with the men who went out with him; a large catch is distributed among the people of the village.

Women who attend at the funerary rites of a dead person to perform the ritual weeping are provided with food, both to eat at the time and to take back home with them. On one occasion some women from Kurtatchi went to the funeral of a child at Tabut; it was the second child that had died in the same family within a few days, and they said they went because they were sorry for the parents. Among them were the relatives of a lad who is betrothed to the sister of the dead children. They were presented with pots when they left. But it was explained to me that the pots were given because the Tabut people were sorry for the ruanbē (husband's parents) of Moras, the sister of the dead boys, and were not reward for the ritual weeping. Parties of women sometimes go to watch by a sick person; they will be given areca-nut and coco-nuts, some of which they will eat as they sit there; what remains will be carried home when they leave.

When guests are invited from distant villages to attend a ceremony it is customary to provide spreads of food, placed on platforms at intervals in the bush along the route, with which they can refresh themselves during the journey (taran in a ken means to prepare a spread of this kind). When we walked to the hill country to attend the wapi ceremony we came to three such places of refreshment. They took the form of a platform made of boughs, on which was placed a number of baskets made of coco-nut palm leaves plaited containing pieces of roast pig and boiled taros; others filled with the eggs of the megapode, almost ready to hatch, cooked and done up in leaves. There were also large packets of ceremonial pudding. Huge bunches of areca-nuts, yellow and green, hung from the posts of the platform, together with bundles of betel-pepper. Guests were supposed to provide their own lime. All along the edge of the platform were hung rows of coco-nuts. The effect was most lavish. We were also plentifully supplied with similar food at the ceremony itself, consuming it in the intervals of waiting. Such displays are not entirely prompted by generosity, or even the desire to make a show, since it is the custom, when guests think that the food provided for them is inadequate, to take revenge by wrecking their hosts' plantations, breaking down their coco-nut and areca palms, and spearing their pigs. It is said that in the olden days the angry guests even went so far as to burn the village and kill many of the inhabitants, including women and children. But, on the other hand, ostentatious display of wealth by single individuals is avoided for fear of 'poison'. They say that if a man prepares a very lavish feast, all the men who know how to make poison say: 'This fellow has made a big feast, we must kill him.' 'They are angry with the man who has done so well at getting food and so they make him die with their bad medicine.'

GIFTS

People are entitled to ask for areca-nuts, coco-nuts, &c., from those who stand to them in the relation of kiar (sibling of the same sex). This applies also to the extension of that relationship beyond the scope of the blood tie as it appears in genealogies (this is discussed on p. 33). No direct payment is offered or expected in such a case, but the recipient is, of course, liable to be called upon in his turn.

Apart from this, the native expects neither to give nor to receive 'something for nothing', unless it be a smouldering ember, which corresponds to our asking for a match.

An exception to this occurs in the case of plantation labourers returning from their three years of service. A certain proportion of their earnings is paid to them as a lump sum at the end of their 'time', and this they usually expend on knives, mouth-organs, and such other trifles as their hearts delight in. But as soon as they return to their own village, friends and relations crowd around, expecting the treasures to be divided amongst them, so that very soon the unfortunate owner has little to show for his labour except the memory of having been for a brief moment the hero of the village.

RECIPROCAL EXCHANGES

There are many occasions on which a presentation of some article, usually a package of ceremonial pudding, is reciprocated by the return, at some future, but not too far distant, time, of a precisely similar article. It would be a gross breach of etiquette to omit to 'back' such a gift in appropriate fashion. When we went to meet the women of Baniu to trade with them for good taro stalks for planting, we took with us some large packets of ceremonial pudding to give to one of them in return for some that had been given on the occasion of Muben's marriage to Kakari several months before.

PROPERTY

Land.

The land belongs to the village group. But the rights in it are vested in the tsunaun tʃan, the man of greatest importance in the village or group of hamlets. He may sell it, either to other natives or to white men, but in practice he would consult the older men of the village before arranging such a transaction. No such deal went through during my residence, and I have no details of prices or media of payment.[1] Pinari had a grudge against Karabun, the
